A LEVELS

A Levels are a nationally recognised and well-respected Sixth Form qualification, providing students with a route through to university or employment.

Students will study a maximum of three A Levels for two academic years or eighteen months. All A Level classes take place on the college site and students will have an individual timetable built around their personal choices. A Level programmes will also have a broadly equivalent amount of 'self-study' time required each week, alongside supervised classroom hours. The amount of independent study time for each individual course will vary but, in general, five hours per week for each A Level is typical.
